The long view

Immediately on entering a gallery of Amanda Penrose Hart's works, one inhales and expands a little. Not all her works are big, but even her small paintings often feel very open. Unusually, The long view includes a picture containing birds. Two eagles gives explicit expression to a feeling a viewer may experience before many of Penrose Hart's big-sky paintings – a feeling of soaring in air, be it empty or occluded, hot or crisp, windy or still.

The roads between Jackadgery, Sofala and Kalkite pass through Gumbainggir, Nganyaywana, Kamilaroi, Geawegal, Wiradjuri, Gundungurra, Ngunnawal and Ngarigo country, but the ancestral lands were cleared long ago, and their creeks and lakes are often dry. Penrose Hart drives alone, taking many detours, pulling over where the view arrests her. She parks for as long as she can stand the heat or cold, looking hard at the anatomy of her view and getting it down, before wiping off her palette knife, packing her stuff – pretty much completed smaller works, preparatory paintings and drawings for scaling up in the studio, sketches – in the tray of her ute and moving on. Free and loose works on paper that have pleased her enough to frame lately include oil sketches made with the soot-dark dregs of mixed paints: a section of columnar tree, very dense, its edges softened and spiked with growth, scant light glimmering through its form; a couple of bristly conifers; a stand of saplings suggested by runnels of diluted medium.

There's a small picture in The long view that depicts a miniature escarpment, taupe, charcoal and pale peanut-butter in colour, beneath a cloud smeared on a light blue sky. In the foreground is scrappy foliage, black; down the left edge, passages of gamboge and moss green. The palette and mood call to mind paintings that Arthur Boyd made in Canberra and surrounding regions, where, curator Mary Eagle wrote, ‘a remarkably blue sky rose endlessly above white-grey pastureland on which shadows were etched in black’.

Penrose Hart’s tiny untitled work is a key to elements that recur across The long view. There’s a mess that the viewer yearns to clear, arriving in the smooth, creamy mid ground before bashing around the base of the rock for a clear look at the country beyond. The same palette, with elements stripped back, occurs in The long view 2, and it’s lavishly expressed in the whopping Lake George, the horizon of which is balanced against lines of fence posts and the vertical strokes of the row of poplars at the base of the hills, sentinels posted along road or river. Ghost poplars they often are, in a ragged row, seeming to disappear in certain lights and dominate in others. The white trunks in the foreground are roughed-up with purple dabs and blotches – last tags of leaves, birds, an old nest? The purple blooms in the tangle of weeds compliment the yellows of the whole. Just as we do when we skirt Lake George/Werriwa by road, looking at Lake George we long to get past the foreground impediments, be out on the flat, gallop like a horse or rise like a hawk.

The long view’s pictures tend to stir, rather than soothe. Twin dramas of nature and the unquiet mind are evoked in The darkness of light, like a stage set for an Australian King Lear: the supermoon illuminates clouds in a turbulent sky, the cold trees are brittle, to the right there’s a small dam, perhaps, and a frail eucalypt, bony trunk gleaming silvery. In Just fine, too, there’s a small gum, dead or just hanging on, in the right foreground. Personal unrest is implied in the titles of Just fine and The night we called it a day, both works in which fervid colours are introduced to blackness, the latter forcing pinks together with light blue, ochre yellow and pond-scum green in a narrative of emotional darkness.

Several pictures in The long view evoke human intervention in the landscape, or its continuing consequences. There’s the scar of construction in Jinabyne, and the plummy rose patches of quarried rock in the green sliver of Mount Ainslie. Look at Cowra new rain after dust storm, its dirty sky, its slick, barren ground, black twigs and broken trunks. There’s the big work Dust storm Murrumbateman in cumquat, lemon, loquat and creamed-honey yellows, the white coin of the sun hunkering low, the windbreak conifers leading the eye across the seared, bald ground. Conifers, too, punctuate the patchwork Farmland, its yellow-grey clouds blanketing fields of pale pink, violet, pale mocha, lime and dark lichen green; poplars break up the glorious From Painters Hill, evoking the powdery dust of the track through a Canberra landscape of bone, beige, olive, khaki, blue and black. From Painters Hill contains touches of the pink tones that startle delightfully in Penrose Hart's work. Look for them, and you'll see them often.

The straggling bushes and starved trees in the foreground of many of these works impart a kind of nonchalance to the compositions, as if the artist is too cool to seek out a more picturesque perspective, too forthright to omit a jarring element. Penrose Hart's vagabond heart imbues her paintings with an air of searching, seeking, seeing, recording, decamping, doing it all again. As a child on long car trips, I'd gaze out the back windows and imagine running up hills I saw, to lie under the sun on what looked like smooth grass at a place where I could see everything. As an adult I know that off the road there'll be hard bushes and thorns, strands of wire in the way, scree and sticky mud underfoot, biting insects and barbed seeds in the sward. Any one of us will carry our own history to the top: sit missing him sorely; wanting her looking out beside us, eyes narrowed against the glare. Looking at Penrose Hart's surely-executed exhibition, as moving as it's maturely composed, I reflect that the long view is for grown-ups.
